pupur: partridge (madi nebe yeda: "it has red stripes").

pumponi: forehead (or fomboni or homboni).

saa, or: saha, or: sabago: dish of dates: the dried, crushed, pitted dates are emptied into a calabash and moistened with warm water.—The calabash, covered, is placed in the sun. The next day, roasted and pounded colocynth seeds are added to the dates; the whole is left in the sun one more day. A compact cake is obtained which is kept and eaten little by little during a journey, but in the evening because this dish makes one thirsty.

sadaga: offerings sacrifices. Some sacrifices are of a more superstitious than religious nature, such as the offerings deposited on the oruoli (see oro) or on graves and left there. This is not true of the sadagas properly speaking, those which punctuate the important stages in the life of a human being: birth (see: fosor), 163 circumcision (see: kaye), death (see: ororo); or those which seek divine protection for the labors and hardships of man: the sadaga to ask for rain when collective distress increases during a persistent drought; sadaga marking the opening of a new pasture; sadaga opening the season of the pollination of the date trees (domor); sadaga signalling the harvest of dates, or the sadaga to conclude this harvest (see tinne); in Tibesti, the sadaga preceding the various sowings, the most solemn being that of October (see bare)—

These sadaga (the particular character of each of which we shall try to analyze along with the word referring to it) have a certain number of common characteristics.

In the first instance, when the sadaga sanctifies, shall we say, an event in the life of the family, the offerings are placed near the hut of the newborn child, of the one newly circumcised, of the family of the deceased, and, also near the hut, a goat is sacrificed by the family.

In the second instance, that of agrarian ceremonies that interest the community, the sadaga is often preceded by a general assembly (see: cofono) which expresses the need for collective purification. At the end of this assembly ■133163 cont. a long procession of women draped in dark blue, their right arms bent back and the palms of their hands holding up to the height of their faces the black wooden cup brimming over with milk, which contains the tibi, proceeds toward the mošidi or toward the koe sadaga, "the place of the sadaga." Some millet cakes are deposited inside the low walls, along with some dates, liquid butter and, in Tibesti, water perfumed with the ediseru, while the word sadagalla is spoken. Outside, the men slaughter a goat. One of them, acting as representative of all of them (dabin) has negotiated the barter of the animal for dates. Generally roasted on flat stones or emi darege, the goat is sometimes boiled. One then proceeds to distribute the offerings among the participants: when they serve the meat and cereal dishes, they take into account, in the assignment of portions, the possible, rare presence of a marabout, the existence of old people and of the poor. The fahiha is recited, then each one returns to his own house carrying his share which it would be unseemly for anyone except children to eat on the spot. Thus there is no "gift" to the protective power, no offering unless it be that of the smoke of the sacrificed goat, which rises up like incense, and the libations of butter or the water of the ediseru. Nor is there, for those present, a meal in common, fraternal reunion, fellowship.

This absence of a true offering is, according to the Dardé Chai, a recent phenomenon and the result of Senussi influence: to leave on the place of sacrifice the animal slaughtered or the dishes of cereal is an idolatrous practice that Sidi Mahdi condemned, a survival of which are the libations of butter and of ediseru water.

When one questions them, the Teda pretend they only half believe in the efficacy of these rites—But when one mentions to the Teda of the plain the ceremonies that take place in Tibesti, then skepticism and modesty disappear: they relate that in those mountains where the purest Teda type is preserved, astonishing manifestations accompany these sadaga: it is not rare that the old men, the best, the bravest, those who have "the pure heart"—owor co—will see, in the course of the ceremony, marching past on the tarso, with a great display of white veils, the cohort 164 of "angels" mounted on beautiful camels. And, after that, rain falls abundantly. sadaṇar, sadaci, sadākar: to make a sadaga—in a broader sense: give alms.

sae, or sahe: see šay.

sae, or: soe (pl. saa): leg—foot—in animals: hind foot (front foot: kobe) sagadu: Kanuri and teda word for cultivated gourd.

sagaano (pl. sagaana): year—sagaano tegesi: "next year"—gorāgor: last year; seems rather to mean "formerly."

saha, or: saeda, or: šafa: victory—happy outcome of an action, obtained through divine assistance, this divine assistance—synonym of gera which, however, seems to mean only material aid.—Alla safa ntye = Allah gera ntye: “May God help you.”

sahar: woman's leather belt, synonym of wurdi (see the word); or child's belt: synonym of tutur.

sahari (pl. sahare): dish of black wood in the shape of a very deep cup, bought in the South; the most attractive usually come from Wadai; sahari bidi: sahari without feet (80).—sahari saada: sahari with three feet. (M.H., Col. Le C., 32-50-78.) They are generally complete with a basketry cover woven by the Teda women—sahari dolaa: double dish of wood meant for twins.

sahe: the last; behind; synonym of: šigedi and of: cucubo.

sakan: tall teapot that is bought from the Tuareg autumn caravan.

salado: cow or camel dung—goni sala ceni: “the camel has colic.” This word can, if necessary, be applied to humans, but as a joke which is taken in bad part.

sale: breath (see: makadi).

salka: chain.

samaltede: flatterer.

samo, or: saō (pl. sama): eye; tei co, or: kwala co: “white of the eyes” = tei yasko, or: kwala yasho: “iris”; (the pupil is not named).

samsara: eyelashes—samsara ovrena: “eyebrows.”

sanja: well of a type frequent in the Fezzan: the rope of the scoop, running on a pulley (gargas), is raised and held by animals: camels or donkeys. A single example in Tibesti is that of Derde Chai.

165

saano (pl. saana): mass of earth; a heap of big rocks.

sano: nervous, resistant—synonym of: girbi.

saonor, saoyi, saonter: to prune a palm tree, that is to say, cut the palms (dira) which, every year, dry up at the base of the bunch of green palms, with a hatchet (tomar) made by the blacksmith—to lop off the tufts of young palm trees.

sara: enclosure—court of sand almost surrounded by a line of stones or by the enclosure of reeds or palms.

sara: tribunal—legal proceedings (but in this sense they use rather medi): Derde sara (or medi) yugopwe “the Derde regulates (intercepts) the proceedings.”—Before applying to the commanding officer of the post and even the chief of the village, one first speaks to certain esteemed old men who play the role of arbiter (yari) (see the gatherings of arbitration or: cofono).	522 Humor

sardar or sarnar , sarçi , sartar or sarentar : to sweep—they sweep with a small bunch of thin rushes (kurdi) abundant in Kawar and Djado.	531 Decorative Art
sarda : comrade (a word more particularly Daza).	535 Dance
sasabanaa : Teda and Kanuri word for Parkinsonia, introduced into Kawar by the French.	585 Nuptials
saši : spring giving rise to a small pool.	586 Termination Of Marriage
sasao : salvia aegyptiaca .	627 Informal In-Group Justice
sawor , or: sagor : circle.	643 Chief Executive
šay , or: sahe : tea— sahe zedo : the green— sahe mado : the black—recently introduced: the Teda of Djado relate that their grandfathers, even their fathers did not know tea and threw it away when, in the course of a raid among the Tuareg, they happened to discover it.	692 Judicial Authority
se (pl. sa): see sae .	736 Dependency
šege , or: šike : (see šešegi and: šigedi): mosquito net, the use of which is beginning to spread in the palm groves of Djado. Rather primitive, it consists of an arch, slightly raised (50 cm.) of withes of palms set in the ground in front of the hut, on which is put a strip of calico.	751 Preventive Medicine
šedeyene , šeene , šedeyentede : (see šidii) to have enough—to be seated.	752 Bodily Injuries
šegedi , or: šigedi : after; following—in the second place—late.	757 Medical Therapy
segide , or: šegide : cold (adjective); colder than: kiride ; but segi means rather the cold of the ground and kiri the cold of the air.	758 Medical Care
sagogoli : plant good for all animals (Erodium malacoides).	763 Dying
sek : fructify (imperative) (see its use in the article: domor)— sono : may it bear fruit— sekenne : it bears fruit, synonym of: yidi mi cenade : "the tree that bears fruit."	764 Burial Practices And Funerals
šelgi : synonym of the Daza: lifini ;—bush, 50 centimeters to one meter high widespread in Kawar and Djado, with which only the goats manage to be somewhat satisfied; its pounded branches are used to remove the fur from a skin before tanning (see gobemor and Teda Tests). They also say 136165 cont. asa —(milkweed: Pergularia tomentosa).	765 Mourning
sell : prayer in accordance with the Muslim law, the rites of which the Teda seem to have been completely ignorant until the arrival of the Senoussi missionaries in Tibesti and Kawar, at the end of the 19th century. Many still know it imperfectly so that the collective prayer 166 is only occasionally observed under the direction of a marabout, generally an Arab merchant passing through from Fezzan.	771 General Character Of Religion
sellige : 1. place of prayer: square of sand in front of the hut (koi sellige), or space circumscribed by a line of stones or low walls: in this case the word preferably used by the Teda is: mošidi . 2. Muslim religious festivals: (laya — cagam — lebi lowel); the idea of collective non-religious festivals came in with the French: sellige nasara : July 14th.	779 Theological Systems
sellum : ladder generally made from a palm trunk with notched steps—synonym of: kokoge .	782 Prayers And Sacrifices
semmer , sepcj , somber : to tighten, a knot, for example.	783 Purification And Atonement
šemezze : goat with bluish ears.	787

šennar, seyi: to water.

šene: tall make of baskets for grain or meal; more generally: kelei šene (see: kelei).

šeene: see: šidii.

senugu: a kind of date jam obtained by packing fresh, pitted dates into a buckskin that is carefully sewed up with palm fibers. The word also designates the container. senugu korano: pouch of goatskin used to hold butter. (M.H., Col. Le C., 32-50-154.)

šeō (pl. šema): coarse gravel, small pebbles (larger than cecer).

šeir: barley cultivated in the Teda gardens of Tibesti or the Kanuri gardens of Kavar—see: bare).

šer: loan or borrowing, credit—while the word: orni means the borrowing or the loan of animals, clothes, things in general, the word ser means the loan or the borrowing of money or food. Buying on credit (see deeno) is considered immoral if it is a matter of grain, of the meat of a slaughtered animal when it was on the point of death.—šerde yabar: “I buy on credit.” šer gonere: “I have taken (made) a debt,” I have borrowed.

šerdar, serci, sertar: to punish. (see: siridar).

šere: goat with one black foot.

šereme, or: swan: flintlock gun which has disappeared in the country the past 20 years.

seri: rust.

šešegi: nets used in the hunt, unknown to the Teda, but which the Azza make and with which they catch gazelles and rabbits (see Teda and Daza Texts).

šii: dung of man or animal. Dark earth, humus suitable for planting, which the women go to fetch in baskets, to improve the garden soil.

šibar, yiso (p), šipar: to winnow with the ofure.

šidano (pl. šidana): fly.

šide: respectful and eager, who greets everybody; helps the aged, etc.—very good—tasty.

sidernar, siderayi, sideranter: to inter.—Laying out the dead sometimes begins before the last breath; if the deceased is female, the women bring water, if male, the men do so, 167 then bathe the face, close the eyelids, and press the stomach in order to induce evacuation; they join the hands, tie them together with doom palm leaves and place them between the knees. They also tie the two big toes together with doom palm leaves. The body is laid with the feet to the north, the head to the south; the face is turned toward the east; the neighbors who have been notified arrive. The body is washed with henna'd water. Then the bonds are untied and the body dressed: a pair of trousers and a “boubou” or blouse, a cap with ear-flaps with the turban over it; a shroud covers the body. A perfume is burned and the body is carried to the burial ground on a stretcher during the hours immediately before sunrise or after sunset (see yuruso); the people leave the grave, saying: “yina dina.” A funeral sacrifice (see: ororo) takes place three, five or seven days later, depending on how far away the kinfolk live.

šidii, šinci, šiyi: to have enough; to be satisfied = šiide = šeene, or: togos; see: tenda agonterda: we are satisfied.

šige, or: šii: handle (šii: ear).

šigedi: see segedi.

sigenne: faded, especially in speaking of a skin or a fabric on which something has faded.

šigedi: mats made of hollow stalks of: giši or of: kurdj, merely matched up and bound, which the French call: secot.

sigenni, or: sigini: (see abi)—common dance of men and women: the drummer who beats the dance rhythm forms the center of the figure; the women, in lines of two or four, turn around him, advancing with little steps, skimming the ground as in steps of the fox-trot; the men, singly or in twos, glide between the lines of women and with rhythmical movements, alternately short and long, brandish their lances and mime a battle, or, following their fancy, a characteristic attitude: the most frequent  138167 cont. is the one that imitates a blind person led by a guide: the hesitations of the step and the groping of the blind person's hands are skilfully matched with the rhythm of the dance. However, this last figure seems to be borrowed from the Blacks of the south. umre saade siginni teri: "the men dance the siginni."

siginni, or: sigini, or: siginnide: a man who stays alone in the pasture to tend the herds.

šigoso: bracelet of cowries around the wrist or the ankle of a small child.

silleri: Arab scout.

šij, or: šimi (pl. šeme): ear—sii yenako: "listen," literally: "give ear."

šimbi: fruit; but seems to denote especially the fruit of odri.

šimege (pl. šimaga, or: šiaga): see soboge—young branches.

šimer, or: šimar, šimpci, šimpar: to force [compel].

šimermar, šipci cog, šimper, makar: beseech—ao tro šer ner yeda simermar: "I beseech this man to lend me money."

šinar, šinci, šindar: to blow one's nose = sisu terar = sisu sarner (I).

sineyidi: a forked stick set in front of the door of the hut or inside the house from which a goatskin bag is suspended.

sini (pl. sine): bag made of goatskin. The animal, hung by the head, is skinned: a few cuts detach the skin from the neck, the sides of which are grasped and drawn from top to bottom—the skin is turned inside out like a finger of a glove, without a tear. It is put to soak for two hours in a bath of carobs of Acacia arabica (gober), then rubbed with a circular motion (kalcamere), with a stone. The bath of gober is renewed, the skin soaked 24 hours more, then rubbed with native soda. Then all the openings are closed: those of the feet (gera sinia) that are tied up, the opening of the neck that is sewed half way—Then the skin is turned again [right side out], is filled with tree bark (kuši) and water [more of] which is added as it evaporates. At the end of ten days the skin is emptied, rubbed with butter or tar (gumši). In order to check whether it has any hole, they inflate it and hang it up for several hours. If it does not become deflated it is ready to be used.—(M.H., Col. Le C., 32-50-104.) sini yide: full leather bottle.—sini loodude: hanging bottle.

sirdar, sirci, sirtar: to comb (daho sirdar).

siri: see: sörö.

siridar, sirici, sirintar: to detest.

šiša: different; contrary to: tirize.

šišinar, šišiye, šišintar: 1. to make many inquiries—2. to  139168 cont. —2. to cook meat with the spit held in the hand.

šišu: nasal mucus.

šiwodo: impolite—injurious—given sometimes for: unfortunate—šiwodo do: impoliteness.

soar, yusuk, sokar: to sew.

soba: comrade (also Kanuri).

sobar, yusop, sopar: 1. to allow, especially when it concerns a single thing or a single person (for more persons or things see: fudar).

2. to forget, in a wider sense, to pardon—3. to divorce.—The man who wants the divorce asks the brother of his wife or one of her kinsmen to bring her a very small piece of wood. She then utters three you-you, removes her necklaces and replaces them for three days with a piece of blue fabric. She leaves immediately, taking her personal effects but leaving in the hut a spoon, a calabash, a mat.

The woman who wishes a divorce (see: adebi) may ask her husband or more generally have him asked by her brother to renounce her—In this case the family returns the gifts.

The children belong to the father, save if they are less than six or seven years old—If they are at the breast, the mother must nurse them or pay six goats as indemnity.

soobo (pl. sooba): the doom palm, the tree itself: the doom palm, its fruit: the doom nut. Like the date palm, the doom palm is used in various ways. The leaves of the doom palm (doosa) furnish the fibers needed for basketry and the making of ropes (ozzi): with the help of a puncheon, one detaches the hard rim of the leaf, only the tender fibers of the middle part are used; these fibers are soaked in water for several hours, or better, moistened, are buried in the sand. They become sufficiently supple to be worked¹⁶⁹ (for dyeing see: malnar—for weaving: tomar). The doom nut is covered with a relatively thin skin (orcioni) which easily comes off when the fruit is green. Its pulp (adodoksi) is sweet: pounded, it sweetens the water used in the preparation of tea or in that of a wheat porridge that the Daza are particularly fond of. The inner part of the pulp (korro) in contact with the kernel is very hard and is used to feed the fire. The kernel, fafi or fahi, pounded, supplements the food of goats, in the oases, and even that of men. In this case the kernels are roasted before being pounded and are reduced to a meal called: maino.

sobo: decorative strips that hang from leather bags.

soboge (pl. sobaga): tree branches—one generally specifies:  140169 cont. soboge tei—soboge odri—soboge gober; however, the word does not apply to the leaf of the palm tree (dira).

soborder, soborci, sobornter: to divine—(also: suburdinne).

soe, or: swi (pl. soa): branches of thron bushes when they are dry.

söfför: species of date of Djado (see tinne).

soko (pl. soka): stake to which one attaches a camel foal when its mother is in pasture or when one is treating her—soko erei toneride: “to attach the camel to the stake."

solaya: small pot provided with a single handle, brought from Fachi by the autumn caravan and used for ablutions, more and more replaced by the kettle of metal. (M.H., Col. Le C., 32-50-71.)

sole (pl. sola): eggs that the Teda sometimes eat hardboiled, but with a certain repugnance—Only children eat them freely. They cook them, then wash their hands after having eaten: but circumcision marks the end of this liberty for the boys—sole curok: "the egg is laid."

soma (pl. samaa): gift given to one who brings back a lost object, or to a woman who anoints the newly circumcised youth on the day of his departure.

sommar or sommer, sobci sompar: to give birth to (a child).

sombo (pl. somba): diminutive: sombwei.—basket of plaited small cords, made exclusively by the women.

somacua: woody plant with white flowers that camels and goats eat.

somoli, or: soōli (pl. somole): a tear.

sonono: cricket.

soō: see samo.

soedi: shoot that fastens the date to the cluster.

soordar, soorci, soorntar: to implore, to demand.

soori: dense thicket developing as soon as vegetation is left to itself around the pools and springs of Kavar and Djado. The gardens of the hill of Timero at Bilma give only a vague idea of what they were in the last centuries; the soori remains celebrated in Kanuri annals as a place of refuge of sedentary people threatened by nomads before the construction of true shelters: the tata or fortified warehouses. The palm grove of Djado, abandoned by the sedentary population, has gone back to its primitive aspect; thick clumps of date palms not cut, creepers, bushes with thorns, tall weeds (ofuri) hard and sharp, above which sway 170 the plumes of reeds (owi): swarm with mosquitoes. The Teda who perchance take the risk of lopping off some bunches of dates in this thicket know that it will cost them stings, deep wounds and lacerations.

sörö: perfume or remedy, often both at the same time, the Teda  141170 cont. attributing to some perfumes a magic quality capable of healing certain maladies. Besides industrial perfumes, recently introduced (adersan), brightly colored liquids and perfumes that the women, and sometimes even the men buy from merchants, the Teda use of large number of traditional perfumes, almost all of vegetable origin: certain woods which give off a perfume when burned (sörö wuni) are generally brought by merchants coming either from Zeila or Bornu, such as the sörö oyū—the sörö olut—the sörö moskwa (which seems to be a bark). To these woods are added roots; the sörö kelekelesoi, the root of a weed of Bornu. The nguru is the tuber of a plant growing in Kavar; the kosoō, the root of a plant likewise from Kavar, gives off a perfume which is said to ease women's labor pains. Certain vegetable gums (sörö mugj) are used, but they are exotic; a species called brandek—the sörö somul looks like a stone.

Woods, roots or gums, pounded, mixed, are thrown in the embers on which tea is prepared, to the great enjoyment of the guests. But it is especially the women who, in their huts, love to burn sprigs of these woods, or scent their clothes, either putting the small pottery cup (mokor) containing the embers under the folds of their garments while walking, or placing the mokor under a stool on which they are sitting.

These perfumes are the ritual accompaniment of festivals: marriages (see azuner)—circumcision (kaye)—births (see fosar), and they are used according to specific traditional rules: for example, the gnuru is specially reserved for marriage, while the brandek is to be avoided precisely on this occasion, being against conception.

Finally, certain fragrant plant elements are considered more as remedies, such as the selbe of Bornu which looks like a grain of millet. Reduced to powder, it is supposed to make the hair grow. Diluted in water, it is used for a massage against rheumatism.—Chicken broth in which wood of the oyu is soaked is a remedy for a cough. Finally, the clove or: gurumbol is a valued counter-irritant = taken in tea it combats the feeling of aching all over when one has influenza, and the pain caused by a hollow tooth is eased if one puts a bit of clove in the tooth.

sörö, in the sense of remedy; also means magic power, the virtue of a thing.

söröde: a man who takes remedies.—sörö mogene, or: ngezede: who knows remedies.

sörnöre: to feel with force—to sniff (I).

sörö koser, sörö yugos: to take care of—The Teda medical art is a curious mixture of superstitions and empirical 142170 cont.practices which show a very exact observation of the “virtues” of certain products (see article above) and especially the counter-irritant and antiseptic properties of heat, of the power of slight blood-letting to relieve congestion. 171 Thus they practice scarification with cupping or: forcide, the incisions on the entire painful part, chiefly on the limbs, on the temples of babies to ward off eye ailments, incisions following pressure to induce the flow of blood. The points of fire are, as much as the incisions, the universal remedy: rheumatic pains, swellings caused by splinters are treated with points of fire, as is a stitch in one's side, or bronchitis, in this case together with cupping. To this is added the healing property of protective talismans: cowries or necklaces of ediseru for children, a ring on the right ear of boys; koheul [?] to protect the eyesight (see yozzor), “moskors” of all kinds.

sösö: sweepings, things without value—bunches of dried weeds, straw.

su (as suffix): on: goni nera su terji nar: “I put the saddle on my camel.”

subdu: Saturday.

subor, or: dobu: navel.

subo: synonym of adofa.

sufra: a kind of small, very low stool on which the women, seated on the ground, knead the griddle-cakes—synonym of: eke gaido.

sugo: conjunction-suffix, meaning “as,” “because”: duguli durar sugo yar: “because I saw the lion, I ran away.”—mure sola tiyenne sugo, tane gurs tar: “since he gave me eggs, I gave him money.”

sugonne: woman leading a bad life, not performing her intimate ablutions.

sugoö, or: sugomo: tail strap of camels.

sugu: tubular plant from which they make “secots”; eaten, only green, by the animals.

sugunar, suguyi, suguntar: to come to the aid of a man deprived of means; for example, following the loss of his camel or the burning of his hut: relatives and friends give gifts in compensation, generally a sum of money determined by custom; it is a true system of “mutual aid.”

sugurtede, or: sugurtenne: very tight fetters (camel).

sugurtudeni, sugurteni, sugurtedenti: to conspire.

sui: stomach.

sukor: sugar, of recent introduction, it has superseded the sugar obtained by steeping and boiling dates in water, or by macerating the pulp of the doom nut.

sumbur (pl. sombora): big silver buckle, sometimes attached to  143171 cont. the earlobe (šii duyendi), but more often attached to a leather band fastened in the hair. Sometimes two or three sombora are arranged in tiers on either side of the face.

sumde: Daza word sometimes used in place of the Teda word: sobo (see this word).
