Section Title(S): The Effect Of Kinship On Reciprocity

The extension of a kin term is almost always accompanied by a corresponding expectation of behavior, either joking or respect (Berndt and Berndt 1964; Helm 1972; Meggitt 1962; Spencer 1959). Specified behavior both makes two people feel at ease with one another and minimizes the possibility of one insulting the other unintentionally and thereby destroying a potential partnership in reciprocity.

In summary, the name relationship among the San, kinship systems based on classificatory kinship or those allowing two individuals with a common relative to establish a kin tie, the Australian section system, etc., are all means by which hunter-gatherers take non- or quasi-kin out of the category of non-kin, equalize them with other kin outside of the small circle of grandparent's descendants and thereby create a very wide range of individuals with whom they can initiate further relationships of reciprocal obligations.
