Section Title(S): Other Relatives-In-Law.

Other Relatives-in-law.

There are terms that may be used when speaking of the kraal of relatives by marriage as a whole, and which may at the same time be used to denote any one member. The words ilikhwe, or less frequently uḃukhwe, or uḃulanda are used in the locative by a married man (with lami or ḃami) and by his brothers and sisters (with lethu or bethu) to indicate his wife's father's kraal or people. The wife or her brothers and sisters refer to the husband's people as ekhakami or umkhwenyane, a general term used by any member of the wife's family (the fathers and mothers using wami, the others wethu) to any member of the husband's family, though more especially to the husband himself. It can thus stand for son-in-law or brother-in-law.² Conversely, umlanda is used by any member of the husband's family (the husband using wami, "my"), the others (wethu, "our") to denote any member of the wife's family, except her fathers and mothers who are umamezala. Parents of two married persons call each other umlingane, umkhwe or, in Natal, umkhozi.³ A man calls his brother's wife umkami (wife).⁴ umak'oti or umloḃokazi,⁵ and his sister's husband umkhwenyawethu (brother-in-law); while to a woman the brother's wife is umak'oti womfowethu or umak'oti womnewethu (purely descriptive terms) and the sister's husband umkhwenyana.

² Bryant, Dictionary.

³ Doke, Ms., and Colenso, Dictionary. The more usual meaning of the word umkhozi is said to be a customer, "one who has bargained fairly with another, and is on that account expected to be civil and friendly towards him" (Bryant, ibid.). Apparently, therefore, this term of relationship has grown out of the loḃola bargaining.

⁴ Faye, Zulu References. The custom of the levirate has influenced the behaviour pattern between a man and his brother's wives. An informant says: "My brother's wives would be my playmates, and if I find that they have cooked something, I would take it without their permission unless it was intended for my brother. I am allowed to give them work to do for me, e.g., the weaving of a mat or a bead decoration for my sticks. Similarly all the sisters of my wife are allowed to joke widely with me, while there is some strain between me and my brother-in-law" (W. B. Vilakazi).
