Chief among these harmful effects was the slave-raiding carried out against the non-Muslims of Yauri by the Fulani, especially those from Kontagora. The religious fervor of the jihad provided a rationale for slave raiders, since theoretically only "pagans" (arna) were potential slaves. According to Mahdi (1968:114) the Kamberi suffered most from the slave trade. But it is clear that all the commoners (talakawa) suffered from the disrupting effects of the slave trade. The Gungawa continued to have access to a safer ethnic identity, that of the "Yaurawa," and eventually, the "Hausa."

The Dukawa suffered in two ways during the nineteenth century, from the slave raids of Ngwamase, father and son, and from the establishment of a Fulani Emirate carved out of Yauri's territory by Sambo (Balogun 1970:126). The Fulani tried to convert the Dukawa, a process they deeply resisted. In order to escape conversion and its alternative, enslavement, the Dukawa moved in large numbers into Shanga District, still part of Yauri Emirate. The Kamberi did not move and consequently suffered most from the slave raids of the Kontagora rulers (Mahdi 1968:114). Furthermore, Mahdi (personal communication) states that the Kamberi suffered such terrible losses from the slave raids and their wars against Ngwamase that they were forced to seek marginal areas in the bush in order to protect themselves. Such historical  -46- experiences led to vast social changes and to the Kamberi's using docility as an adaptive mechanism (Mahdi:personal communication).

Some of these changes were: the movement from towns to rural areas; the decentralization of political authority; and a refusal to use force to defend themselves. It is suggestive that they provided wives for every ethnic group in Yauri except the Dukawa, who were already their allies and enjoyed a joking relationship with them.
